RESEARCHING OLDER NEW JERSEY LAWS

Researchers often need to find the text of given New Jersey statutes from their origins, before amendments, or at given dates in the past. The State Library Law Section is the ideal place to do such research. The law collection includes all the superseded statute volumes and pocket parts, all the older New Jersey statutory compilations, and indexes of old laws from colonial times.

The current arrangement of New Jersey statutes as found in Lexis, Westlaw and New Jersey Statutes Annotated (NJSA) originated with the Revised Statutes of 1937. Enactments or amendments since the 1937 revision are found in session law notations under statute text in NJSA. Here you can see when and where a statute was enacted or amended during those years. You can read that earlier text by either going to the annual chapter law volumes in the law section, or going to the superseded NJSA volumes and pocket parts that were in use at the time of the enactment

If the statutory section originates before the 1937 revision, the "source" note under the "historical notes" annotation for the section provides information as to the origin of the section. These source notes refer the researcher to the previous 1877 revision or to a year and chapter law number if the statute was enacted after 1877.

With a subject index covering the period 1663 to 1903 and separate indexes to colonial and state laws, Hood's Index of Colonial and State Laws is another useful tool to research old laws. The colonial index refers you to pages in law compilations from the period. The state laws index, beginning in 1776, refers to pages in the annual chapter law compilations. COME TO OUR MIDDAY TRAINING SESSIONS

They are FREE and informative

June 20, 11 a.m. to noon.: PubMed Basics

This workshop covers navigating the PubMed search page, finding specific article citations, constructing a search, limiting the search, and saving search results. PubMed is the free, public version of MEDLINE, the U.S. National Library of Medicine's premier biomedical database. It contains over 17 million citations to professional-level medical and life science journals.
